Dr. Goelzhauser uses information obtained from public records requests to analyze how commissions and governors select candidates for the bench. The evidence suggests that although commissions and governors seem to use certain qualifications, women are disadvantaged at the commission stage and partisanship is relevant at both stages. Goelzhauser concludes the results could have important implications for our understanding of merit selection's institutional performance and the broader judicial selection debate.